

Equal Pay for Equal Work

What the Colorado Law Means for Employers

Women across the United States have made progress in terms of employment and earnings in recent years, but still face inequities that prevent them from reaching their potential or achieving economic security. To address these inequities, Colorado's Equal Pay for Equal Work law (EPEW, effective January 1, 2021) prohibits all employers from discriminating because of sex (including gender identity) — alone or with another protected status — by paying less for substantially similar work in terms of skill, effort and responsibility. Employer requirements within EPEW include listing compensation in job postings, notifying employees of promotional opportunities, and keeping job description and wage rate records.

A review of hundreds of job postings by Colorado's 50 largest employers during the first months of EPEW confirms that the overwhelming majority (and an increasing number over time) are posting compensation as required -- showing that this group of successful businesses has successfully adjusted their job postings to give Coloradans the greater pay transparency that the Act requires, and that is leveling the playing field for all Coloradans.

Less than 1% of remote job postings exclude Colorado workers, and roughly 99% of remote jobs remain as available to Coloradans as they've always been.

Spot-checking before and after EPEW's effective date showed that numerous major employers who had not previously listed salaries in their job postings, began doing so once EPEW took effect.

What EPEW means for Colorado employers

Colorado employers with employees in Colorado are required to comply with EPEW, including for remote jobs.

What EPEW means for out of state employers

An out-of-state employer without existing Colorado staff that posts a remote job is NOT covered by the law's salary-posting requirement — even if a Coloradan applies for the job. There is no need for these employers to limit their own talent pool by excluding Coloradans, just to avoid complying with a law that does not apply to them, and CDLE is initiating efforts to explain that guidance in individualized outreach to those employers. Generally speaking, out-of-state companies hiring remote workers are complying with EPEW and are helping to close the pay gap between men and women and people of color.

Compliance through education

CDLE has a commitment to fostering compliance through proactive outreach and education not penalties. As with any new employer requirement, the Department will have a consistent outreach effort through webinars, online resources and share new data as it becomes available. Fact sheets and more information are available at coloradolaborlaw.gov.

Employers may also contact the Division at 303-318-8441 or cdle\_labor\_standards@state.co.us with questions.

COLORADO
Department of Labor and Employment